

Making Sense of Crime in the United States and France: Intelligence Analysis, Police, and Security

Professor Jacqueline Ross

University of Illinois College of Law

Matthew Torigian (Commentator)

Deputy Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services, Ontario

April 7, 2016

Noon to 2 p.m.

Munk School of Global Affairs | 315 Bloor Street West

Professor Jacqueline Ross is the Mildred Van Voorhis Jones Scholar in Law at the University of Illinois College of Law, and researches in the fields of evidence and criminal law and procedure. In this lunchtime lecture, Professor Ross will speak about her recent research on how French and American police use local security partnerships as sources of intelligence. Professor Ross has published extensively on undercover policing and local security partnerships in the United States and Europe and is currently working on a book examining undercover policing in a comparative context for the Oxford University Press. This book offers a sustained look at how the United States, Germany, Italy and France conceptualize and regulate covert operations, and is based on over 250 interviews conducted in the United States and Europe with covert agents, liaison officials, prosecutors, defense lawyers, and judges.

Light lunch will be provided | Registration required: <http://munkschool.utoronto.ca/event/20327/>
